What is Political Science? Political science has been defined as the study of power and electoral systems, but more broadly encompasses the study of human relationships and interactions with one another. This subject intends to address how we approach these topics in a specific time period - such as communism, for example. More broadly, political scientists will examine how political systems work, what motivates individuals to participate in politics, and issues such as corruption or citizenship. Researchers who study this field may also study international relations between countries or ethnopolitics that compares different ethnic groups. One key aspect of research is studying the relationship between society and government (sociology). This study may focus on aspects such as politics, law, and culture. Subjects include politics, sociology, economics, management studies and statistics. A political scientist may also focus on the science of public institutions - that is, how institutions work and why they sometimes fail. For example, a political scientist might analyze how judges make decisions or the effects of lobbying groups. In this vein, a public policy professor might research issues such as global warming or child nutrition in developing nations. Important areas of political science research include comparative politics (which seeks to explain differences among political systems), comparative government (which compares the governments of different countries), and government and politics (which studies the processes involved in governing). There are also sub-disciplines of political science, including law and politics; international relations; public administration; public policy; elections; public opinion; social movements. Political science is the study of the numerous institutions that form part of "the modern state" - its political structure, legal provisions, administrative procedures, rules for elections or other types of governance. It also studies the behavior of individuals and leaders as well as the interactions among these behavioral units. Political scientists "researches politics" and "political behavior". There are various political science degree programs, including:

Currently, there is no field-wide certification or official title for political scientists. However, some universities such as the University of Wisconsin-Madison offer doctorate programs for students with an academic interest in this field. Other non-academic institutions such as The Fund For Peace also offer degrees related to political science.
